CALL FOR PAPERS

HOUSING AND SOCIETY
Special Issue: Housing and Health

Guest Editor: David Turcotte

Housing and Society, announces a call for papers to appear in a special issue of the journal related to the theme, “Housing and Health” edited by David Turcotte.

Housing is fundamental to the quality of life in communities and is an important social determinant of health. Housing that is well designed, located and maintained is essential to mental and physical health of occupants. Many factors influence how housing affects individual and community health, such as physical conditions, behavior of residents, location, neighborhood activities, accessibility, affordability, ambient environmental quality and impacts from manmade and natural disasters. This special issue of Housing and Society will highlight the connection between housing and health by addressing the variety of elements that influences this link. We welcome manuscripts with a variety of methodological approaches, study designs and units of analysis, including statistical studies of large data sets, policy impacts and implications on various levels, behavioral studies and local intervention, environmental and impact assessment studies.

Topics of interest focused on the relationship between housing and health include, but are not limited to, those addressing:

Aging in Place

Healthy Homes

Impacts of Structural Conditions and Hazards

Energy Efficiency and Sustainability

Impacts of Housing Instability

Accessibility and Homelessness

Climate Change and Natural Disasters

Behaviors of Occupants

Affordability and Financial Burden

Public Policy

Neighborhood Impacts
